Will an ssd microsoft server 2008 repair the delay on wake from sleep.. Again, thanks. A: This can not be reproduced since I can send and receive emails without any issues in the same environment. I think that this might be a temporary issue for some not-yet-migrated mail servers or some email clients. Q: Virtual Destroying with knockout I am very new to knockout. I have some classes. One main class has a reference to a child class via an observable array. At the same time, the child class has a reference back to the main class via an observable array. I am using knockout to subscribe to both observables so that when either of them change, the VM is updated to reflect the change and update the other. Problem: When I set a virtual destructor on the child class, it seems to cause a boom in the subscriber count (using knockout debug.js) with a very large number of subscription callbacks. This leads to a memory leak (logical, since you don't want to listen to an array with a massive number of subscribers). How do you best deal with this? Should I be using a factory for my child classes and have them each create their own instance of the main class via the factory? EDIT As an answer to having a factory, I should add that I am using Aurelia as a view model binder. If you pass an instance of a type that has a virtual destructor, Aurelia will create a new instance of the type, call the virtual constructor, and set it in the view model. By the time the submodel is set in
