In the operation of internal combustion engines, it is generally desirable to maintain the temperature of the lubricating oil within a predetermined temperature range during operation of the engine. For example, it is desirable to maintain lubricating oil at a predetermined temperature so as to maintain the viscosity of the oil within a safe range for the engine and other components during operation of the engine. Also, many types of internal combustion engines utilize a lubricating oil cooler for heat transfer from the engine to the lubricating oil. Recently, there has been developed and commercialized a system for the engine/cooling of the oil comprising an oil cooler coupled to the oil tank of the vehicle so as to utilize the engine's cooling system to cool the lubricating oil flowing through the oil cooler. A disadvantage with such system is that it is necessary to remove the gear oil manually and pour the gear oil into the oil tank before starting the vehicle. Thus, removal of the oil prior to starting the vehicle is a disadvantage of such system. Also, in this system, the oil tank is of a fixed volume and when the oil in the oil tank is needed, the vehicle is stopped and the oil is removed from the tank using a conventional pump or scoop. Thus, each time a predetermined amount of oil is needed, the vehicle is stopped and the oil is removed. This inefficiency in the operation of the system limits its usefulness. Accordingly, it is an object of the present invention to provide a system for the cooling of the engine oil which eliminates the need to remove the oil manually. It is also an object of the present invention to

Toll-like receptors (TLRs) are non-conventional pattern recognition receptors that are used by the immune system to recognize a wide variety of pathogens, including microbial components called pathogen associated molecular patterns (PAMPs). TLRs are found on numerous immune cells including myeloid and dendritic cells, macrophages, monocytes, and natural killer cells. TLRs are important in the activation of innate immunity, and signal both through a MyD88-dependent pathway, as well as a MyD88-independent pathway, in response to microbial ligand. Microbial pathogen-derived ligands can induce ligand-receptor binding and hetero- or homo-dimerization. Ligand binding to TLR and subsequent dimerization results in the recruitment of accessory molecules such as members of the Toll/IL-1 receptor (TIR) domain family, and activation of kinase activity. MyD88-independent pathways can also signal through a TRIF dependent pathway. MyD88 independent TLRs are critical for anti-viral defense, and in addition to recognition of PAMPs, TLR can be activated by the release of endogenous compounds, termed damage-associated molecular patterns (DAMPs), known to be released by necrotic cells and possibly also by apoptotic cells. TLR activation, particularly through the MyD88-dependent pathway, has been shown to play a major role in the activation of adaptive immune responses, both in the myeloid compartment, and in CD4+ T-cells and CD8+ T-cells. CD4+ T-cells, in particular, have been shown to be potent activators of the immune system upon stimulation through TLRs, producing cytokines, such as IL-12 and type-1 interferons (IFN-alpha/beta), that can act in an autocrine manner to promote further T-cell stimulation. There are a growing number of studies implicating TLRs as central mediators of inflammatory disease. Toll-like receptor (TLR) 2 and TLR4 have both been shown to mediate ischemia/reperfusion injury in animal models of myocardial infarction and heart failure, and polymorphisms of TLR4 have been linked to susceptibility to coronary artery disease. Human genetic studies have identified variants of the TLR4 gene (TLR4 Asp299Gly and Thr399Ile) to be linked to susceptibility to multiple sclerosis (O'R
