Field of the Invention This invention relates to thermally resilient, flexible, polymer films, and to methods of making them. 2. Description of the Related Art Thermoplastic films such as those used in packaging, are frequently supplied in roll form. Since the films are usually tacky or slippery prior to printing, they stick to themselves, to each other, to the machinery and to the printed images on which they are being processed. To process the film in such a way that the film is handled and printed without the film sticking, it is common to spray a release agent onto the film. The release agent is typically nonpolar oil or oil-soluble additive. The release agent is often called "flash" or "oil-flash". Although the oil easily evaporates, it can leave a residue on the film which causes registration problems. Also, since oil is a petroleum derivative, for environmental considerations, some people call this additive "petrochemicals". Thermoplastic films are typically either single-layer or multilayer films. Multi-layer films are typically biaxially oriented and may have several layers. Single-layer films usually are uniaxially oriented (drawn) and have very few layers. The present invention is directed to films having multiple layers of any orientation 0cc13bf012
