Drawing on his years of experience and research on the subject, Kawasaki dives into the key issues facing entrepreneurs and shows how to navigate the... - the Annual Economic Outlook 2009, the July 2009 Issue of Out Of the Change, with features on Immigration, (we cannot seem to get in there) and Building Nurture for Everyone, (only a few people signed up for this one). The following people commented on "It Looks Like the Muslim Lawsuit Industry's Big Fat Government Subsidiary... Or So They Think" news: Lawyers who wind up suing someone whose religious conviction is a substantial part of the case have stepped up a game. They're suing their clients using federal law. And they're only doing so because they think they can win. "There is no precedent for this," says former U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement. Clement's a senior partner at the law firm Jones Day, with a specialty in government law. His firm specializes in constitutional issues. And it's time that became a big part of a lawyers' business: The Supreme Court is considering lawsuits filed by attorneys who represent plaintiffs who insist they can't be fired because of their religious beliefs, and several have racked up millions in fees even though clients' fortunes have often turned out to be worse than the attorneys believed they would be. "It's absolutely classic cat-and-mouse," says Professor Daniel Armstrong of the State University of New York School of Law. Armstrong notes that clients and their lawyers frequently find that, when the litigation is over, the case is much weaker than the lawyers originally predicted -- and much stronger than they anticipated. "Both sides are playing the game," he says. Bradley Bond, the director of the U.S. Program of the International Association of Islamic Studies, is helping lawyers handle these cases. He says the point is to force the judges to rethink "a very legalistic interpretation of the Constitution's First Amendment that is all about the literal text." One of the strongest cases so far is a suit filed in 2005 in which a former Baptist pastor says the church fired him in
