Image copyright Reuters Image caption Mr Romney and Mr Obama have clashed several times during their campaign US President Barack Obama and Mitt Romney have agreed to attend Saturday's Olympic opening ceremony in London, US and British officials say. Neither candidate had confirmed an agreement before the games officially began on Friday. But the London Organising Committee of the Olympic Games (LOCOG) says the leaders will take their places in the stadium on Friday morning. Ticketing has been opened for the ceremony on Saturday, which features more than 2,000 performers. Tickets - as well as hospitality packages - for the opening ceremony and the Paralympic Games have been sold out, so an influx of visitors are expected on Saturday, when the BBC will be on the ground for live coverage of the event. US and UK authorities have warned people not to bring any weapons or drugs into the stadium, although tickets granted access to the Olympic Park are valid for the 2012 Games. Earlier this week, a briefing on the Games was held in the Olympic Park for members of the royal family, the prime minister and top officials. Mitt Romney, the Republican candidate for the White House, has clashed several times with Mr Obama during the campaign for the US presidency. They will not face-to-face in their first head-to-head debate on Friday night in Denver, Colorado. Media playback is unsupported on your device Media caption Tickets are available to buy for the opening ceremony on Friday The Republican nominee has accused the president of "pandering" to core Democratic support by emphasising the need for a strong military. But Mr Obama says their military commitments to the Middle East have led to the deaths of civilians. The Games are being held in the capital of the UK's Olympic host city, but the key games are taking place within the Olympic Park, a large area of land partly south of the River Thames in east London.
